at No. 21 East Twenty-first street. He began to abuse her, she swore, immediately after their wedding, knocking her down and beating her.

"The fact is," said John P. Lamerdin, in opposition, "this young woman didn't like housework, and she would not do housework. She told on a couch while her young husband washed and dried the dishes, scrubbed the floor and did all the acts of housework."

"I repeatedly washed and dried the dishes and also scrubbed the floor of the kitchen, polished the stove, brought up coal, carried out ashes and, in fact, performed all of the duties that the wife of a man in my circumstances should attend to. I carefully performed these various household duties, hoping thereby to please my wife and make her happy, but try as I would my wife never seemed to be pleased, satisfied or contented."

Uncle Otto Metz says in an affidavit that he caught his nephew scrubbing the kitchen floor while his wife lounged on a couch.

"It struck me as so funny that I laughed," says Uncle Otto, "and at that time she said she would not scrub floors."
